

Showcasing research from the Computational Surface Science group led by Prof. Reinhard J. Maurer at the Department of Chemistry, University of Warwick, United Kingdom.

Plasmonic enhancement of molecular hydrogen dissociation on metallic magnesium nanoclusters

The optical and catalytic properties of magnesium nanoclusters have been characterized using first principles simulations. Magnesium nanoclusters exhibit plasmonic resonances in the Ultraviolet region that generate a high concentration of hot carriers. It is shown that plasmonically-induced hot electrons can facilitate hydrogen chemistry on this Earth-abundant metal.

As featured in:

See Reinhard J. Maurer et al., Nanoscale, 2021, 13, 11058.